Workers. New Mothers Need Not Appry.
TOKYO — Ever since she was a young girl, all Erica Takato wanted to do was work with small children. A few weeks into her term, she requested time off for bed rest ordered by her doctor.	Transformer + RoBER
	+ image attention
	+ weighted RoBERT
	+ location-aware
	+ face attention
Union officials and former teachers cite a major obstacle to the aspirations:	+ object attention

Ground-truth caption

Japan Desperately Needs More Day Care

Workers, New Mothers Need Not Apply.

 Transformer + RoBERTa
 Ms. Takato, with her son, Kishiko, and their children, from left, Kaiti, 3, and Kaitama, 3, at a day care center in Tokyo.

 + weighted RoBERTa
 Ms. Takato, with her son, Shiro, and son, at home in Tokyo.

 + weighted RoBERTa
 Ms. Takato, who was pregnant, said she was "so frustrated and lost hope of being able to work."

 + location-aware
 A day care center in Tokyo.

A child care center in Tokyo. The government is eager to bring more women into the work force, and is trying to come up with enough child care for mothers.

A day care worker in Tokyo. The government is trying to bring more women into the work force, and the government is trying to come up with enough child care for mothers to go back to work.

A nursery school teacher showing a bug to his class.

Ms. Takato, who was born in Japan, was forced out of the day